Tappin' People's Money, with a Team of Rivals Most people know that in a typical boardroom, conflicts often arise between the CEO and CFO of a company. Sometimes those conflicts escalate and the CEO makes the fateful decision to fire one or both of his or her direct reports. To make matters worse, those same executives will blame their subordinates for "sabotaging" the performance of the company. If you have heard of a similar scenario, you probably assumed that it would be common to have directors that lack the skills, training, and expertise necessary to perform their directorial duties. After all, isn't the job of a director to sit in the background and oversee the actions of those who are actually working to help grow and strengthen the company? The answer is, "not necessarily." Earlier this year, I spoke with a group of experienced, professional, and talented managers that work for one of the world's largest professional services firms. What interested me most about the group was that they were all at different levels within the firm, and were being groomed to move up the ranks. As we chatted, I asked them to describe the various roles, duties, and responsibilities of their various titles. It was almost like seeing a team of rivals, with one boss for each of them, and a team of directors. Each man had a different role, but there was no doubt in the least about who was responsible for achieving that role. The same can be said of companies. In today's marketplace, the best companies are those that have managers that are clearly talented in their field, and who are able to clearly articulate the mission and vision of the company and the role that each individual plays in that success. The best directors also are able to clearly articulate the mission and vision of the company and the role that each individual plays in that success. So, what does this have to do with you and I? It means that if you want to manage your company and your staff, you need to plan on hiring people that are clearly talented and that have clear visions for their roles. You also need to be able to train them to excel in their specific roles, and clearly define their role and the role of the company. If you can do that, you'll be able to 8215746af
